What is a Flexible Learning Environment?

A flexible learning environment is a space that allows for adaptability and versatility in learning. This includes the physical space as well as pedagogy, timetabling and school culture. It is student-centred and often affords students the agency to choose how they learn. The physical classroom features furniture that can be moved and rearranged according to the type of learning.

Furniture in this type of space needs to be flexible, mobile and adaptable to individual needs. It can be moved or arranged into another layout and used in various ways to accommodate different learners. Flexible classrooms can create spaces for small groups, individual learning and presentation style learning. Some common features include breakout spaces for collaborative learning, nooks and quiet spaces for reflection as well as larger spaces that can be rearranged to make smaller environments.

Flexible learning environments promote collaboration, discussion and team work. Students become active participants in their learning instead of passive listeners, and teachers are often seen as mentors and facilitators for high-quality learning. Open-ended, functional and flexible furniture is required for these environments to support both teachers and students. Furniture usually includes stools and chairs in various heights as well as cushions, couches and ottomans. Tables are easily grouped together and may feature whiteboard table tops for brainstorming and collaboration. Standing desks and flexi stools with curved bases are also popular to encourage active and movement-based engagement. The classroom environment needs to be able to mirror the adaptability and personalisation of the learning.

Future Focused Learning

Future Focused Learning (FFL) is a student-focused pedagogical approach that is flexible in nature and can adapt to the needs of individual students. These types of learning environments inspire students to be co-designers of their learning. This personalised approach fosters agency and collaboration, and both the pedagogy and the classroom environment reflect these practices. The aim is to prepare students for a fast-paced future where adaptability and creative and critical thinking are paramount. The Reggio Emilia philosophy classes the environment as a third teacher, and this approach is perfectly suited to FFL environments. As we continue to recognise the many different learning styles of individuals, it is important that learning environment furniture continues to evolve in order to best reflect these changes and to support the various pedagogies being used in 21st century learning environments. Our range of innovative and flexible furniture has been designed to support the transition from 'traditional classrooms' to 'flexible learning environments' while still remaining appropriate for use in traditional classrooms.

Types of Learning Spaces

A great way to design a learning space is to use the Campfire, Cave and Watering Hole method. David Thornburg¹ identified these spatial typologies, and they provide an excellent structure for designing a classroom around different learning styles.

Campfires

The campfire is a space where individuals gather and have a single focal point (expert). Campfire spaces facilitate teacher-led and student-led learning and supports the presentation of ideas, questions and answers. Individuals come together in large groups to gather knowledge. Examples of this type of space are traditional classroom or lecture theatres.

Caves

This type of space encourages self-reflection and quiet learning. It is a private environment that supports individual and reflective learning. Caves can be removed from the general learning space, be semi-enclosed or even just a quiet nook inside a greater classroom. These spaces offer a sense of security, calm and quiet.

Watering Holes

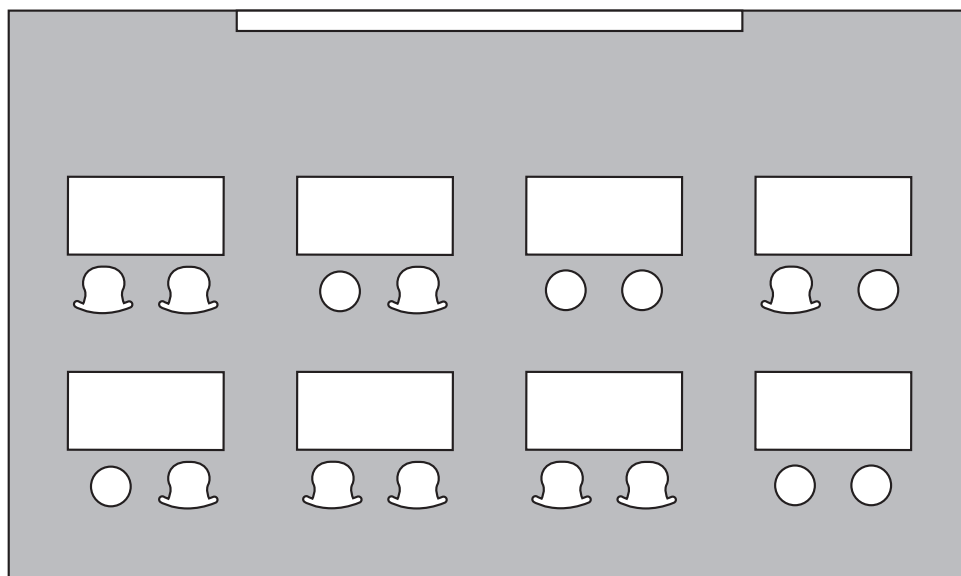

A watering hole is an informal space that supports peer-to-peer interaction. Collaboration, discussion, mentoring and guidance are promoted. It is a social space that can support a sense of belonging and culture. Watering holes are often used in small group work and task-orientated learning.

¹ Thornburg, D. 2007, "Campfires in cyberspace: primordial metaphors for learning in the 21st century." International Journal of Instructional Technology and Distance Learning, vol.1, no.10, October 2004.

Active Learning Classroom

Includes round tables suitable for up to 6 students
Features moveable chairs or stools
Promotes collaboration and supports group work

Active Learning Classrooms (ALCs) have a distinct set of inclusions to facilitate learning. Round, curved or grouped semi-circle tables are combined with moveable seating. This encourages students to face each other and work in small groups of no more than 6 people. Often each table setting will include a whiteboard. This can be on the table itself or used as a separate furniture piece. These type of learning spaces are suited for task-orientated and small group learning. Simply combine our Ergerite Semi Circle Tables and our Height Adjustable Stools to create an Active Learning Classroom.
