Top 5 Tips For using LEGO® Education in Early Childhood Settings – By Luke Touhill

1. Make LEGO® Education an everyday experience

When children have the opportunity to use LEGO® Education regularly they quickly learn how to use it effectively.

2. Build a collection of specialist pieces

Sometimes children's interest in a particular way or type of building means you need lots of specialist pieces. Consider some of the specialist equipment packs such as vehicle parts, roof tiles or windows, doors and people to supplement your general LEGO Education collection.

3. Is it easy to find the right piece?

Think about how children will search for the pieces they want – several containers are often better than one (especially if there are more than 3 or 4 children using the area) and wide shallow containers work better than smaller deeper ones. If you're really organised consider sorting the LEGO bricks into basic categories to make finding the right pieces even easier.

4. Encourage ideas

LEGO Education is about being creative but not everyone can be creative in a vacuum. Sometimes too much freedom is as limiting as not enough. Provide pictures and other stimulus to encourage children's ideas. Those who want them will use them, those who don't will build for themselves anyway. Pictures of real life objects, photos of children's previous models and simple instructions are all good ways to stimulate an initial idea.

5. It's not all about the building

Once children have built something they usually want to play with it. Is there room for this to happen? And what happens to the children's constructions once they've finished with them? Is there somewhere safe they can be kept to show parents and siblings at the end of the day or to return to later in the day? Can educators (or children) take a photo of the model for future reference or discussion?

“It’s a flying car... you can sit in the front or at the back or at the side so that you can go in whatever direction you want to. The propellers help it to fly and it has computers so that you don’t get lost” - Will, age 4

Actual size

“Children’s First LEGO® brick creations may not look like much... but just ask a question and you’ll usually find a powerful story and a whole set of complex ideas!”
– Luke Touhill

Building Relationships: LEGO® Education & Social Development

For young children LEGO® Education play is a social experience. They don't just build - they talk about what they are doing, compare creations, share ideas and pieces, and give each other building advice along the way. All the time learning what it is to be part of a group, to negotiate and share, to take turns and to work together cooperatively.

And that's just the start. Once they've finished building they usually want to play with what they've made... and that's a whole world of social play!
